Introduction

The area known as Silvermine is part of the municipalities of Norwalk, Wilton and New Canaan. The mine which gave the place its name was actively used in colonial times, but was subsequently abandoned because the silver was of poor quality. Today nobody even knows where it was situated. In 1895 the attractive landscape with a winding river and old barns and farmhouses attracted the sculptor Solon Borglum. He passed the word to his artist friends and founded the Silvermine art colony. Artists who made their homes and studios in Silvermine included Addison Miller, Howard Logan Hildebrandt, Daniel Putnam Brinley, Carl Schmitt, the George Picknells, Bernard Gutmann, Hamilton Hamilton, Frank Townsend Hutchens, Justin and Johnny Gruelle, Henry Salem Hubbell, Leo Dorn, Charles Reiffel, John Cassell, Harry Townsend, David Robinson, Adele Klaer and many others. The first organized art movement was called the Knockers’ Club. It met in Borglum’s studio to “knock” [critique] each other’s work and held exhibitions starting from 1908. In 1924 the artists incorporated, bought a barn and converted it to an art gallery.
The art colony called the Silvermine Guild of Artists started with painting and later branched out to include almost all of the creative arts: sculpture, design, ceramics, photography, music, drama and dance. Regular exhibitions were held throughout the year, not just of local artists, but also wide-ranging international shows. The “Silvermine Sillies” inspired by the experimental plays were designed, directed and acted by the Guild members. The freshness and satire of the “Silvermine Sillies” attracted even professionals looking for material.

Today, the Silvermine Arts Center is comprised of a Guild of over 300 professional artists, five galleries which present new exhibitions every six weeks and sponsor prestigious regional and national competitions, a School of Art which provides a wide range of classes for people of all ages, public programs and outreach programs in the Norwalk and Stamford schools.
